5. Transaction Monitoring

5.1. The electronic monitoring of transactions is an issue that is receiving a great deal of attention by the financial services industry. More and more transactions are being undertaken electronically, without any human intervention, providing those involved in money laundering with greater opportunities to launder money and to remain undetected.

5.2. Transaction monitoring allows the Company to monitor Client's transactions daily in real-time. By combining this information with analysis of the historical information and account profile, the software and/or any other mean used for transaction monitoring can provide the Company with a "whole picture" analysis of a Client's profile, risk levels and predicted future activity and can also create alerts according to which suspicious transaction reports can be produced and filed. The transactions monitored include inter alia deposits and withdrawals, wire transfers and account trading activity. The transaction monitoring might also include sanctions screening, blacklist screening and Client's profiling features through different software devices.

5.3. Transactions executed for the Client are compared and evaluated against the anticipated movement of the account, the standard turnover, the declared annual income and net worth, business and Client's data/information held and according to the economic profile of the Client. Transactions executed for Partners are compared and evaluated against the current business information and performance expectations as declared by them during the registration. Significant deviations are investigated, and the findings are recorded in the file of the Client or Partner. The Company may in its sole discretion proceed with applying enhanced due diligence measures and request by the Client or Partner to provide any additional document and/or information and/or data as it deems necessary.
